

Which AID-funded organizations are still standing? Devex, 30 Apr 2025

Three months into Trump's second term, the aid sector is sorting through the rubble. Over the last few days, my colleague Miguel Antonio Tamonan has done the same — and he's figured out which organizations have survived the storm so far.

“Overall, we identified 15 organizations with at least $100 million of active unobligated funding,” Miguel writes. “Among them, four are for-profit, eight are nonprofit, two are multilaterals, and one is a U.S. government agency.”

So, who made the list? Chemonics is at number one, with seven active awards worth a cumulative $11.4 billion. FHI 360 comes next, with 16 active awards worth $2.2 billion. And Abt Global ranks third, with three active awards worth $1 billion.

That being said, there is a caveat. Miguel analyzed unobligated funding to create this list — that is, part of the total cost estimate that's not yet committed but could potentially be received by the organization in the future. In a typical scenario, obligated money would be channeled to its intended target. But today, many are bracing for rescissions or even impoundment of obligated funds by the U.S. Congress, meaning lawmakers could claw back money that was already slated to be spent.
