

US aid cuts, in real time. By Anna Gawel, Devex Newswire, 20 Oct 2025

U.S. international aid cuts were announced months ago, but their effects are still rippling through systems, upending programs, projects, and lives around the world. Yet no single source exists to track these impacts as they unfold in real time.

That's the gap The Aid Report is built to fill. We're launching our most ambitious journalism initiative yet: A news site that will capture how the U.S. aid cuts are playing out on the ground — with medical supply chains, nutrition programs, and lives at stake. All in one place, we'll share verified reports from the field, combined with original Devex reporting and aggregated stories from outside sources. Think of it as a live database of what's actually happening as billions in funding disappear.

“We're at a critical moment for U.S. interests where policymakers and the public need real-world stories of how the aid cuts are playing out,” said Devex President and Editor-in-Chief Raj Kumar. “That's exactly what The Aid Report aims to deliver — the facts for an informed debate about the future of U.S. aid policy.”

The Aid Report is journalism-driven, but it relies on the community to power it. We're calling on all aid workers, development implementers, and researchers across the Devex community — everywhere in the world — to share what they're seeing firsthand. Everything gets verified before going live on the site. Email our editor Kelli Rogers at kelli.rogers@devex.com or message her via Signal.

It's our boldest journalism project yet, launching at a moment when verified evidence matters more than ever. We hope you'll support this effort by sharing what you know.

 This work is made possible through a media grant from the Gates Foundation. Devex retains full editorial independence.